

The Last Lecture was a good lecture, and I really liked all the jokes, but besides that Randy Pausch's advice was incredible. Sure, some of it was basic stuff like failure is learning, but then there were points like this one that I really liked, "Brick walls are there for a reason: they let us prove how badly we want things." and that stuck with me throughout the rest of the lecture. It is basic and I feel most people would say something along the lines of "Well yeah that makes sense.", but I realized from that, that I'm not someone who just gives up because the going gets tough, I give up because something doesn't matter enough to me to deserve to make me mad or annoyed. And sure, there are times when I give up solely because something is too hard, but I get back to it, I don't quit for good if it still matters, I just take a break. Then there's this point, "When you're screwing up and nobody's saying anything to you anymore that means they gave up.", which is sad, but it also says that when someone is yelling at you to get better, that means they believe in some way that you can do better. I really liked this lecture, and it was a nice first lecture as I have never had to sit through one before, and I'm sad that Randy is gone, but I'm more thankful he left this lecture to us, or more accurately for him, to his kids.
